The new National Education Policy (NEP) 2020 is establishing a comprehensive framework that will bring sweeping changes to the Indian education system. The need for the education policy was first felt in 1964 but the bill was passed by the parliament in 1968 after taking suggestions from a 17-member Education Commission.

A new education policy is reviewed every few decades. The latest one has replaced the 1986 education policy, which was in place for 34 years.

Currently, the implementation of the education policy requires multiple actions and initiatives to be taken by different bodies systematically. The Government organizations (both at the center and state level), the Ministry of Education and the educational institutions need to cooperate to implement the policy at all levels.

This was discussed during the global premiere event Elets 20th World Education Summit, which was organized on 7-9 September 2021 virtually. The challenges to implementing the National Education Policy are many but it is requisite to put a plan and structure into operations that will emphasize developing the creative potential of each individual.

National Education Policy is trying to nurture skill-based learning, which is essential for the students of the 21st century. The need of the hour is to concentrate on critical thinking abilities, analytical skills, communication skills and enhance emotional intelligence. NEP 2020 will play a crucial role in the holistic development of a child. Earlier, the old policy was paying more attention to improving the academic areas of the children but the current NEP emphasizes that cognitive skills are as imperative as foundational learning and development.

The National Education Policy talks about fulfilling human potential, developing an equitable and unjust society, promoting national education, providing universal accessibility, and focusing on quality the new education policy. I think it was the right time for the government to introduce

Moreover, the experts highlighted that the learning should be in multidisciplinary areas that allows the students to learn and explore subjects of various disciplines and are not limited to a particular curriculum. For instance, a student of engineering can opt subjects like humanities, economics, political science including others.

In the midst of multiple op-eds and commentaries about the NEP, this article attempts to analyse the policy from the lens of practitioners. In particular, we examine nine key chapters of the 'school education' section from our experience over the last five years of having seen the policy life-cycle through formulation, implementation, and (lack of) evaluation in Maharashtra.

Water-soluble CdSe Quantum Dots Synthesis via Facile Seed-Mediated Approach and Their Characterization Studies

Dr. Manoj Kumar Mittal

Associate Professor, Shri Ram College, Muzaffar Nagar

Abstract

In this paper, we are reporting the water-soluble quantum dots exhibiting emission in visible range from 550 to 650 nm. These have been synthesized by a simple seed-mediated approach using cadmium chloride, sodium borohydrate, selenium powder and thioglycolic acid as precursors. The as-prepared cadmium selenide (CdSe) quantum dots were characterized by UV-Vis spectroscopy (UV-Vis), photoluminescence (PL) spectroscopy, Fourier transfer infrared spectroscopy (FTIR), energy dispersive X-ray spectroscopy (EDS) and scanning electron microscopy (SEM). The obtained water-soluble quantum dots exhibited excellent composition, spherical geometry, strong emission and good stability which can be suitable for biomedical imaging applications.

Keywords: Quantum dots, emission, UV-Vis, PL, FTIR, SEM, EDS

INTRODUCTION

Semiconductor nanoparticles are notable for their wide fundamental research and industrial applications [1, 2]. Their defining characteristics are their size, which is within the range of 1–100 nm, and excellent chemical stability. The strong confinement of excited electrons and holes leads to dramatically different optical and electronic properties compared to the bulk semiconductor [3]. Up till now, many methods have been reported for the preparation of semiconductor nanoparticles, including molecular beam epitaxy [4], metal organic chemical deposition [5], solvothermal [6] and hydrothermal methods [7]. CdSe colloidal nanoparticles are most widely investigated as their emissions can be easily tuned to cover from red to blue with decreasing nanoparticle size [8]. Until now, many works have been reported on the synthesis of II–VI QDs, especially CdSe QDs fabricated by a low-temperature organometallic precursor route, which was first published by Murray et al. [9]. These QDs had a wide fluorescent emission spectrum ranging from blue to red shift. QDs have also been expected to be used as fluorescent labels for biological applications and excellent water solubility, stability and biological compatibility [10–13]. Water-soluble CdSe semiconductor nanoparticles with thioglycolic acid as capping agent have provided an interesting and alternative method to prepare semiconductor nanoparticles. Compared with the organic system, the aqueous approach is environmentally benign and very economical.

In this work, we have developed a seed-mediated approach for the synthesis of good-quality CdSe QDs in water by simply mixing CdCl₂, sodium borohydrate, thioglycolic acid, and selenium powder. Thioglycolic acid acted as a capping agent and controlled the size of the quantum dots. The UV-Vis spectra and PL spectra were done to identify the optical properties. Further, FTIR and SEM characterization was done to study the QDs. The synthetic parameters affecting the growth and the optical properties of CdSe QDs, such as the Cd²⁺/NaBH₄/TGA ratios, precursor concentrations, pH, and growth temperature were thoroughly investigated. Highly reproducible large-scale synthesis of CdSe QDs with good visible emission could readily be achieved.
